Jewish educators interact with individuals with disabilities frequently. How can our learning environments best support a range of neurodivergent needs? What challenges do we need to understand to best design effective learning models? In this course, students will explore the field of Jewish special education through the lens of neurodiversity. By understanding both the strengths and challenges of learners with neurologically-based disabilities, educators can more effectively and appropriately design Jewish educational experiences to meet learners' unique needs. The course will address both the neurobiological underpinnings of disabilities ranging from learning challenges to psychological disorders and pervasive developmental disorders, as well as particular Jewish communal responses to address them. Students participating in this course will deepen their understanding of the field of Jewish special education through reflection, research, and the application of neurodiversity to the design of nurturing and inclusive learning environments. This course begins at the start of the summer semester on June 17; students will be expected to complete readings, online discussion, and one larger performance task. During the week of July 21-26, the class will meet in-person (Sunday evening-Thursday afternoon) for a combination of trips, guest speakers, performance tasks, and learning. The final performance task will be due August 15, at the formal end of the summer semester.

This course interweaves pedagogy and content in an integrated approach to teaching about American Jewish history and life. Through primary and secondary sources, students will explore the evolution of American Jewish organizations as well as their contemporary work, constituents and challenges. At the same time, the faculty will introduce pedagogical theory to help students consider how to utilize this content in formal and experiential learning environments. Students will thus gain a graduate level understanding of the communities in which they work, the skills to critically analyze historical and contemporary institutional texts, and a chance to explore application to practice in a variety of educational settings. Assignments and dialogue among students will help to formulate individualized strategies for teaching this at appropriate age levels and in varied environments.

This course provides IFJE fellows with the unique opportunity for real-time synchronous learning at Hebrew College in Newton, MA. The seminar uses intersectionality as a lens through which to better understand Jewish intermarriage and interfaith families' Jewish engagement. Students will grapple with sensitive materials as a small group, engaging with questions about Jewish peoplehood, identity construction, intermarriage politics, antisemitism, and inclusion. Such questions may include: Why do some people think that opposing intermarriage is racist and what are the counter arguments? How does using race to understand intermarriage expand our understanding of who is Jewish? To what extent do Ashkenazi and Sephardi perceptions of Jewish identity skew public discourse about intermarriage and engagement? What does "Half Jewish" really mean? How does language influence gender construction and engagement of queer interfaith couples? What can Jewish engagement professionals do to create inclusive communities that celebrate intersectional Jewish identities?

Schoolology will open June 17 and close August 23, 2019

In the late 18th century, a small circle of Jewish mystics (or hasidim) began to fan out across Eastern Europe. Over the course of the next hundred years, these mystics effectively transformed not only the landscape of East European Jewish institutional life, but the essence of how Jewish individuals both understand and experience the complexity of the soul, the breadth of the world, the heart of the Divine. In this course we will delve into the history, psychology and theology of Hasidism. We will investigate its legends and lore, as well as analyze the sermons of its leaders. Additionally, we will read academic articles to help us grasp the cultural contexts out of which this mystical movement emerged. Through conversation and writing, we will discern for ourselves which parts of Hasidic thought feel relevant, which feel alienating (perhaps even distressing), and what has the potential to be personally meaningful to us and/or our students.

We will also study some other units of the festival liturgy that are not unique to it, such as Torah reading, Hallel and Yizkor. For each unit, we will use three approaches. The first is historical, looking at chronological development. Secondly, we will observe literary features, such as structure, theme and use of language. Finally, we will consider the theological message. Each of these approaches (or a combination of them) can be further explored in the student's written work.

We will also discuss the history, performance practice, and texts of the Haftarah. Each student will prepare to chant one Haftarah reading as their final assignment. Emphasis of the class will be on achieving fluency with the melodies, chanting accurately and with good pronunciation, and demonstrating textual understanding when chanting.

Prerequisites:

- ◆ Proficiency in reading Biblical Hebrew.
- ◆ Ability to learn melodies quickly – students will be asked to learn the trope melodies at home, before each class, and we will spend our class time practicing and applying them to texts. Recordings of the trope melodies that we'll use are available at <https://www.chantingthehebrewbible.com/listen>, for those who wish to study them before the start of the course (highly recommended).
- ◆ Fluency in sight-reading trope from punctuated texts of Torah. Students do not need to already have the Jacobson melodies for the trope systems we study memorized, but they must be comfortable naming and identifying the different te'amim by sight.
